Kindness and empathy help us to relate to other people and have more positive and meaningful relationships with friends, family, and even perfect strangers we may encounter. Besides improving personal relationships, being kind benefits one's mental, emotional, and physical health.

Kindness contributes to the maintenance of good health and changes brain chemistry. It releases the hormone oxytocin which protects the heart (by lowering blood pressure) and reduces inflammation. When one is kind, endorphins, the body's natural painkiller, and feel-good hormones such as serotonin, the neurotransmitter responsible for feelings of satisfaction and well-being, are also released.

Anxiety is an extremely common human experience. While there are several ways to reduce anxiety such as meditation, exercise, medication, and natural remedies, it turns out that being kind to others can be one of the easiest, most inexpensive way to keep anxiety at bay. Showing kindness, helping, and building relationships with others lets you get outside of yourself and take a break from the stress factors in your own life. It is an effective strategy for reducing the impact you get outside of yourself and take a break from the stress factors in your own life. It is an effective strategy for reducing the impact of stress on your emotional well-being.

So how can we show and share kindness? Smile and give meaningful compliments to others as often as possible. Be kind to yourself first, because it would be hard to help others unless you are kind to yourself. Look for opportunities to be kind, however small it may seem. At the end of the day, you will realise that kindness really matters and can bring about positive changes in one's life.
