Floating Doctors

In 2006, Ben LaBrot, a young doctor, went on a vacation to Tanzania. He visited a small Maasai village of about 140 people. Some of the people in the village were sick and had to have some medicine, but there wasn't any in the village. There also weren't any doctors or hospitals. Dr. Ben spent many hours helping the people. He had some medicine in his bag for them, but he didn't have enough supplies to help everyone. At that moment, he had an idea. He wanted to bring help and medicine to patients who lived far away from cities with hospitals.

Less than three years later, Dr. Ben started Floating Doctors. First he found a very old ship in Florida. Together with his sister and friends, he started to fix the ship and collect supplies. Student doctors offered to work as volunteer with him on the ship.

Today, Floating Doctors has a fleet of small boats with doctors and nurses. They sail to small villages in Panama where there are no hospitals. Sometimes the doctors and nurses also have to walk for many miles through the jungle to get to these places. They treat sick people, they bring medicine to them, and they also teach people how to stay healthy.
