Sarah Begum travels around the world, but the people she meets and their lives interest her more than where they are from. Sarah first became interested in knowing about people from other places when she was 9, after studying about the trees that were cut down for the wood or land in the Amazon. 'I had visions of tribal people calling me,' she says. At the age of 21, while studying filmmaking in London, she decided the time had come to make her dream come true. 'I looked for more information about this tribe in the Amazon and just went there,' she says. Once in Ecuador, Sarah met sound engineer Stephen Bull and cinematographer Frank Angeleyk and taught English to children in the Amazon region for two weeks. They then set off on a two-day boat trip through waters full of crocodiles and piranha fish to get to the village where the Huaorani people live. Sarah made a documentary about the Huaorani way of life, through her experiences with them. She hunted with warriors, joined the women in their activities and was chosen to become a member of the tribe. But the scariest moment was when they told her to take off her clothes and the women began to dress her as a bride. 'I was chosen... and I had no idea what was going to happen to me,' she says. But she soon discovered that the ceremony didn't make her a married woman in any legal sense and was just part of their welcome into the tribe.
