How potatoes became popular in Greece

Count John Kapodistrias was elected as the first head of state of independent Greece (1827-33) after a long in European politics and diplomacy. He is considered the founder of the Greek State, and the founder of Greek independence. Among other things, in an effort to raise the living of the population he introduced the cultivation of the potato into Greece.

legend, Kapodistrias ordered that potatoes should be to anyone who was interested. However the population was unwilling at first to accept the offer. The legend continues, that he then ordered that the whole shipment of potatoes was unloaded on public display on the docks of Nafplion, and placed it under guard to make the people that they were valuable. Soon, people would to look at the guarded potatoes and some started to steal them. The guards had been ordered in advance to turn a blind to such behaviour, and soon the potatoes had all been "stolen" and Kapodistrias' plan to them to Greece had succeeded. And now some of the most famous Greek dishes, like moussaka, use potatoes as a basic
