

Lesson 6: Pronoun Case

Pronoun Cases

Every pronoun has a case, which indicates its relationship to a verb or noun. There are four common cases.

Subjective (or nominative) pronouns (I, you, he, she, we, they, who, etc.) are used primarily as subjects of verbs.

Objective pronouns (me, you, him, her, them, whom, etc.) are used primarily as objects of verbs.

Possessive pronouns (my/mine, her/hers, their/theirs, whose, etc.) show attribution or ownership.

Reflexive pronouns (myself, yourself, himself, herself, themselves, etc.) show an object equated with the subject or show emphasis.

Subjective Pronouns

Subjective pronouns are used only as subjects of verbs or as predicate nominatives.

Subject of real verb: Jenna and I were the only two at the meeting.

Subject of implied verb: My brother is taller than I (am).

Although the verb isn't written, its meaning is implied.

Predicate nominative: The winner of the prize was she.

A predicate nominative is a pronoun or noun "linked" to the subject by a linking verb. It takes the subjective case.

Example:

Matthew is the new captain of the team.
subject verb predicate nominative

The mountain became a violent volcano.
subject verb predicate nominative

Objective Pronouns

Objective pronouns are used as objects of verbs or as objects of prepositions.

Object of verb: My father struggled to raise my brother and me.

Object of preposition: This should be a great opportunity for you and her.

When you have a compound phrase like Tom and me and the coach and them, deciding the case of the pronoun is easier if you leave out the other part of the phrase.

Sheila and (her or she?) took the cab uptown.
——— She took the cab uptown not Her took the cab uptown.

It was made for you and (me or I?) ——— It was made for me not It was made for I.

Possessive Pronouns

Don't use the objective case when you should use the possessive case before a gerund.

Wrong: I resent you taking the car without asking.

Right: I resent your taking the car without asking.

The object of the verb resent is taking: the taking is what I resent, so using the objective pronoun you only confuses things. Since it's not you whom I resent, the possessive case your makes sense.

Reflexive Pronouns

Reflexive pronouns are used in only two ways: to show that a subject and object are the same, as in "I pinched myself to make sure I wasn't dreaming," or to emphasize a noun or pronoun, as in "I myself would never say such a thing." Never use a reflexive pronoun where an objective pronoun is required. Wrong: The crowd applauded Carl and myself. Right: The crowd applauded Carl and me.

Worksheet 6: Pronoun Case

Choose the correct pronoun in each sentence below.

1. The university presented the honor to David and (he/him).
2. After the game, we all agreed that no one had played harder than (he/him).
3. Justine and (me/I) have always been closest friends.
4. There is no point in (our/us) delaying the tests any longer.
5. I shall grant immortality to (he/him) who can pull the sword from the stone.
6. It seems quite clear that you and (I/me) will have to work together to solve this problem.
7. It might be hard for (him and me/he and I) to agree.
8. The other cheerleaders and (her/she) needed to practice on the weekend.
9. The tabloid media were thrilled about (him/his) making such a fool of himself in public.
10. (We/Us) and the other members debated the issue for over 2 hours.
11. The owners of the club offered my wife and (me/I) a free bottle of wine with dinner.
12. No other runner on the team could outrun (myself/me).
13. The teachers were getting tired of (him/his) constantly falling asleep in class.
14. The ballpark always held a special attraction for Dave and (I/me).
15. Our friends gave a party for Ingrid and (I/me/myself).
16. In anticipation of the trip, I bought (me/myself) a nice new suitcase.