A. READ THE ARTICLE

The reality of communication today. Communication changes

by Amanda Mitchell

Teenagers love their cell phones and social networking sites, but there's conflict at home because of it. I talked to kids, parents, and expects to find out what's going on.

1. ____ "My cell phone is a great way for me to communicate with my friends," student Sarah Davis says. Sarah explained that she wanted to hang out with her friends after school – at the mall or in the park – but these days it wasn't easy. She said her mother, Becky, worried about her going out alone. "so, we go to social networking sites and hang out together that way." Becky isn't happy about it. "That's all she does," she complains.
2. ____ In the past 30 years, parents have become more concerned about security issues. Becky explained that kids in her generation hung out together every day. They rode their bikes to the mall, to each other's houses, or to the park. "But I just don't think that's safe anymore," she says.
3. ____ Psychologist Dr. Richard Turner said that conflict about cell phone use is becoming a common problem in families. "These kids grew up with cell phones. At the same time, parents are uncomfortable with the constant cell phone use. Obviously, families need to find a balance between safety concerns and a teenager's need to be with friends."
4. ____ Students are busier than they used to be. This is another reason why they spend time on social networking sites. "Universities like students who are active and engaged," student Mike Owens explains. That means that Mike does sports or other activities every day after school. "there's just no time to hang out with my friends. We use social networking sites instant," Mike laughs. He said that his parents sometimes get upset about this. "But what can I do? It's the reality!"
