

At the bar

A pub (public house) is a building in Britain or Ireland where you can buy alcoholic and non-alcoholic drinks, which specialises in beer and often serves food too. Pubs are more informal than other types of bars. Sometimes they have pool rooms or jukeboxes, or host special nights for quizzes or live gigs. They are often open in the day and are always open at night.

A lounge bar, also called a saloon bar, is a public room in a hotel or restaurant where you can buy alcoholic drinks. It is generally more luxurious than other bars and drinks are usually more expensive. Lounge bars tend to stay open later than pubs, but not as late as nightclubs.

A cocktail bar specialises in cocktails, drinks which combine different spirits and fruit juices or cream. These bars are usually open at the same times as pubs, but are more sophisticated and expensive, and often have a cheap happy hour at about the time people finish work in the evening.

Wine bars specialise in selling different types of wine, although you can often order a meal at the same time. They are usually more sophisticated and more expensive than pubs and they are always open at night and sometimes during the day.

There are also nightclubs, where you go to dance, drink alcohol and watch entertainment like live music, so the atmosphere is exciting. Drinks are usually very expensive, but the bar stays open until much later than in pubs or wine bars.

A coffee bar, on the other hand, is a small restaurant that serves coffees and other non-alcoholic drinks and light refreshments such as sandwiches and cakes. They are usually only open during the day. The atmosphere is friendly and they are not very expensive.

A snack bar is a kind of informal, inexpensive restaurant where you can buy non-alcoholic drinks and eat small meals such as sandwiches or snacks. They are usually only open during the daytime.
