RUSH

Today I leave school late and my mother is waiting for me; as always, away from the other moms. I look at her and see that she is not having a great day. She has a bruise on her face. She hugs me, kisses me, takes my hand very tightly and says:

-Now we have to run. She tells me very tired.

We go to buy bread and take the bus. On the way there is an accident so we have to stop. I look at Mom and see her desperate face. And I see that she sighs loudly. It makes me sad that I can't help her. I would like to tell the driver to run, to go somewhere else, or not to go so slow. BUT I CAN NOT

And I think of the unbearable screams, of my mother's crying, of the usual questions: Where do you come from so late? " "Who have you been with?" "The food had to be on the table ..." "NOT GOOD FOR ANYTHING ...!

I look at my mom and she squeezes my hand tightly. And in her eyes, full of tears, I can read: "Tomorrow everything will finally be different"
