What happens to the body in space?

Human beings will only be able to explore space if astronauts remain (1. health) _____ while they travel and work there. Scientists are therefore very (2. interest) _____ in gathering (3. evident) _____ about what happens to the human body in space.

The body is a complex system that (4. automatic) _____ detects changes in its (5. surround) _____ and responds to them. When astronauts become weightless, the (6. major) _____ of them suffer from space motion sickness.

The body soon adapts, however and, although some astronauts can feel very (7. comfort) _____ at first, the effects do not usually last long.

In zero gravity, liquids in the body move towards the head, so astronauts have thinner legs while in space, and (8. slight) _____ swollen faces. The heart has to work less hard to pump blood, and astronauts do not need the full (9. strong) _____ of their skeleton and muscles to support them. (10. consequence) _____, astronauts need to do plenty of exercise in space in order to maintain body tone and bone density.
