Family in Vietnam

The majority of families in Vietnam are extended ones, where three or more generations live in the same house and take care of each other. Extended families look similar to a mini society, in which the most elderly have the strongest voice and are (1) for most activities in their house. The younger generation shows (2) for the older generation and vice versa, the old generation tolerates the young. The children are expected to ask for their parents' (3) on their activities or plans. As a member of family, one person receives both (4) and (5) support from other members, particularly when he or she is in trouble. Vice versa, he or she is expected to help other members in his or her family when they are in need. In general, families are expected to be a source of (6) , where every member may feel (7) when getting together.

However, the findings from a recent (8) show that these days, more newly-married couples in Vietnam choose to live in a nuclear family. They would prefer to obtain (9) in their family life and to avoid possible (10) when different generations live together.
