Read the following blog. Pay special attention to the negative forms of the simple present, time expressions, and infinitives in bold.

Work is very important to Americans. They often ask each other about their jobs. But they don't ask each other, "How much money do you make?" They don't talk about their wages or salaries.

Americans usually work five days a week. Many people get paid every two weeks. Most office workers and teachers don't work on Saturdays and Sundays. But many people have other days off. Workers in stores and restaurants hardly ever have days off on weekends. Stores and restaurants are very busy on Saturdays and Sundays.

Full-time work is usually eight hours a day, or forty hours a week, but many Americans work more. Some people complain about their hours. They don't like to work so much. But others want to make more money. People with hourly wages get extra money for each hour of overtime work.

Sometimes a day off doesn't mean free time. Many people don't relax on their days off. Some people get part-time jobs on these days. High school and college students often have part-time jobs.

Today, the average American worker doesn't expect to keep the same job for a long time. Young people change jobs often. Older people don't like to change jobs as often. The typical worker doesn't stay at one job for more than five years, but people over sixty stay at their jobs for around ten years.
