Napoleon and the battle of the rabbits

This battle happened in July 1807, after Napoleon signed the Treaties of Tilsit. To celebrate the occasion, he proposed a rabbit hunt with his men and asked Alexandre Berthier to organize it.

Berthier collected somewhere between several hundred and 3,000 rabbits. On the day of the hunt the cages with rabbits were placed all along the edges of a massive field. When Napoleon and his guests arrived, the animals were released and the hunt began. However, instead of running away the rabbits bombarded Napoleon and his men. There were so many of them that Napoleon had to escape in his carriage. Why were the rabbits so courageous? The answer is simple: Berthier did not trap wild rabbits, he simply took tame rabbits raised by local farmers in nearby towns. And these were not afraid of humans.
