The Orange Festival

It's a cool February afternoon in the small town of Ivrea¹ in Northern Italy. The streets are usually quiet, but today they're full of people as the four-day Orange Festival begins. The "Carnevale di Ivrea" is over 900 years old. It celebrates the story of a girl named Violetta. She killed the town's evil¹ leader and freed² the people of Ivrea. The festival remembers the fight that took place between the people of Ivrea and the evil leader's soldiers. In the original fight, people threw rocks at the soldiers. Today, participants throw oranges. At the start of the Orange Festival, a young woman dressed as Violetta speaks to the people and gives them candy. After that, the orange fights begin. To participate, you need to join a team—you can be on a team of "freedom fighters" or soldiers. If you don't want to fight, you must wear a red hat. Then no one will throw oranges at you. It's a lot of fun!

¹Something evil is very bad.

²To free people means to let them go.

The Festival of Color

The Festival of Color, also called Holi, is a popular spring celebration. It takes place every year, usually in early or mid March, in India and other countries like Nepal and Sri Lanka. In Indian mythology,³ an evil woman tried to kill a young man named Prahlad by burning him in a fire. Because Prahlad was a good person, he escaped⁴ from the fire unhurt. Today, people remember this event by lighting large fires in the streets on the night before Holi. The fire is a symbol⁵ of the end of all bad things. The next day, Holi, celebrates the start of spring and a new beginning. To celebrate, people gather in the streets. They throw colored powder into the air and say, "Holi Holi!" Others throw colored water or powder at each other. By the end of the festival, the streets are filled with color and smiles!

³Mythology is a collection of very old traditional stories.

⁴If you escape from something bad, you get away from it.

⁵A symbol is something that represents something else. For example, a picture of a heart is a symbol of love.
