An employment contract is an agreement between an employer and an employee at the commencement of the period of employment and stating the exact nature of their business relationship, specifically what compensation the employee will receive in exchange for specific work performed.

An employer's duty is to provide written particulars of employment with an employee. It allows the employee to know concretely what to expect and is expected in terms of wages, holiday rights, notice in the event of dismissal, job description and so on. An employer may not legally offer a contract in which the employer pays the worker less than a minimum wage. An employee may not, for instance, agree to a contract which allows an employer to dismiss them unfairly.

There are two ways of termination. According to the employment contract an employee have the right to leave the job and such decision is called voluntary termination. Such an action is commonly known as "resignation", or "giving notice". Involuntary termination refers to the employee's departure at the hands of the employer. Some terminations occur as a result of mutual agreement between the employer and employee.

There are differing classifications of workers within a company. Some are full-time and permanent and receive a guaranteed salary, while others are hired for short term contracts or work as temps (temporary workers) or consultants.

Employees can be organized into trade unions; they represent most of the available work force in a single organization. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights identifies the ability to organize trade unions as a fundamental human right.

A collective agreement or bargaining is a labor contract between an employer and one or more unions. Collective bargaining consists of the process of negotiation between representatives of a union and employers in respect of the terms and conditions of employment of workers, such as wages, hours of work, working conditions and grievance-procedures, and about the rights and responsibilities of trade unions.
