New Cause Found for Cruise Ship Illnesses

On several different cruises during the past year, hundreds of passengers and crew members became sick. Until recently, many people thought poor food handling was the cause of the illnesses on the cruise ships. However, some doctors were not certain, and thought there could be other causes. The actual cause of the illness was a mystery. Now, a new report identified the cause of these recent illnesses.

A common virus called the Norwalk virus is responsible for some of these outbreaks. The Norwalk virus spreads easily from person to person, but is not caused by poor sanitation. Most people recover from the illness quickly. There are ways to avoid the virus. Passengers and crew should wash their hands often. People should also avoid touching their eyes, nose, and mouth. Large cruise ships carry thousands of passengers and crew members and illnesses can spread quickly. With a few precautions, people can stop the spread of the virus.
