A rainbow is an arc of color in the sky that can be seen when the sun shines through falling rain. The (20) _____of colors starts with red on the outside and changes through orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo to violet on the inside. A rainbow is created when white light is (21) _____while entering a droplet of water, split into separate colours, and reflected back. On the ground, the bottom part is hidden, but in the sky, like (22) _____ a flying airplane, it can be seen as a circle around the point opposite the Sun.

A rainbow occurs when light hits the water drops in the atmosphere (23) _____a certain angle. It is an atmospheric phenomenon that is formed through optical processes such as refraction, dispersion, internal reflection and secondary refraction.

If the light source is the sun, then the rainbow will be colorful and bright. When a beam of sunlight enters the water drop the degree of refraction of the different colors is variable. Violet light has the (24) _____wavelength therefore, its degree of refraction is also the greatest; red light has a longer wavelength therefore its degree of refraction is the smallest. The degrees of refraction of the other colors lie within this range.

Therefore, a solar halo with violet light in the (25) _____ and red at the outermost edge is formed, and that's why the rainbow we see is always violet on the inside and red on the outside. The visual angle (the angle from the ground surface to the vertex of the rainbow) is about 42°.

A secondary rainbow is different from a primary rainbow only in that it is formed by secondary reflection of light within the raindrops. Therefore, when we see the light reflected by the raindrops the spectrum of the light is the exact (26) _____ from that of a primary rainbow, which means the secondary rainbow is red on the inside and violet on the outside. It has a visual angle of about 50° and is (27) _____ with the primary rainbow.

On my 69th birthday, my dear wife gave me one week in a French language school. Six years ago we bought a holiday home in the southwest of France. My wife speaks the language fluently, having read French at university, but I often complained about the problem I had understanding our French neighbours.

The course my wife had chosen was to be very intensive. The working day would start at 8.15 and end at 10.30 at night. French had to be spoken at all times. Certainly there were times when I thought of the school as a kind of open prison. There weren't any locks on the door except to keep intruders out, but nobody, as far as I know, left the premises during the week we were there. We were a very dedicated group.

Let me tell you about my fellow students. There were twenty-four of us from no fewer than eleven countries from Finland to Venezuela. The sexes were evenly represented. In age, we ranged from thirties to late sixties. Five were absolute beginners, but none of us was fluent. The reasons for our being there varied considerably but most were attending for professional or business reasons.

As soon as dinner was over on the first evening, we were given the first of two comprehensive multiple choice tests to establish our level. I didn't do too badly at the grammar, but I found I was absolutely hopeless at comprehension.

The next morning the serious work began - and continued without a break apart from meals and sleep until the following Friday evening. I was placed in a group with four others, a Norwegian woman MP, a Dutchman, an American from the Museum of Modern Art in Philadelphia, and a young English woman who was taking a job in Marseilles. Our teacher was Nathalie, very bright and jolly and wonderfully patient with our dreadful accents and endless mistakes.

At 6.20 p.m. most of us were allowed out to play - but many stayed on to do further revision with their textbooks and cassettes, or they put on their Walkmans to work by the swimming pool. Some were taking even more intensive courses and had private tuition before dinner. After dinner, we would watch the television news and be cross-examined as to what we had understood - in my case pathetically little, though perhaps I had a slightly better ear by the end of the week.

Most people reckoned that, however exhausting, they had got what they came for. Some were staying on for a second or third week; others intended to come back the next year. Of course we had a complaint or two. I would have preferred to be in a group of three rather than five, since two of our bunch slowed up our progress, and I would have appreciated more help in spoken French and less time spent on reflexive verbs and prepositions. But by the end I was certainly more confident in comprehension and pronunciation. What made the course a success? Mostly the teachers who were, without exception, a wonderful team: cheerful, enthusiastic and patient.
