The Fox and the Crow

By: Aesop

One day, there was a crow on a tree branch, holding a piece of meat in her beak. When a fox that was passing by the tree, he saw the crow and smelled her piece of mouth-watering meat. His tummy rumbled. "Hmmm, the meat looks so tasty; I do love to have a nice bit of it," the fox said to himself.

Now the crafty fox approached the crow and greeted her. "Good day to you, madam! You look just perfect today. I have never seen such a silky set of feathers before," said the fox sneakily. "And what a beautiful color it is, so luscious and dark. If all the animals in this wood had said that you have a terrible voice, I would have called you the most beautiful and graceful bird in this wood. However, what they say cannot be true, I am sure that your voice must surpass all of the other birds here, just as your figure does. Oh, if only I could hear it," the fox continued.

The crow was flattered to hear such kind words. She could not resist her desire to show off her voice. She lifted up her head and opened her beak. At that very moment, the meat fell down. "Thank you, madam," said the fox after quickly snapped the falling meat.

The fox then said, "As a favor, I will give you a piece of wise advice for the future: If somebody flatters you, think carefully before you decide to trust him!"
