In Europe much has been done to reduce it, but I strongly believe that we still need to take more action.

This way they will grow up to appreciate diversity and they will be able to identify cases of discrimination and speak out against them.

In my opinion fixing the legal system and promoting educational programmes are two of the main methods we should employ.

Treating people differently based on the colour of their skin, their gender, religion or sexuality is unfair and has no justification.

Discrimination remains a problem in society today in many parts of the world.

Children should learn at school to accept and celebrate diversity by being introduced to a variety of different role models and rejecting stereotypes.

First of all, it is important that laws are made to prevent discrimination and to punish people who make a distinction in favour or against people based on the group they belong to.

In short, progress is being made in the fight against discrimination but there is more work to do.

If a Muslim woman applied for a job and the company refused to hire her because she wanted to wear a face covering, the law should not allow it.

Secondly, we must make sure that people's awareness of these issues is raised at an early age.
