Listening carefully & fill in the gaps

A top (1) for one of the world's most (2) computer games has said that video games should be an Olympics sport. Rob Pardo, who was chief creative (3) for the World of Warcraft game, told the BBC his game and other video games should be part of the Olympic Games. He said the (4) needed to become more modern and up-to-date. He added that millions of people around the world love playing and watching (5)gaming, which is also known as e-sports. Mr Pardo said: "I think the way that you look at e-sports is that it's a very competitive skillset....You look at these (6)gamers and the reflexes are lightning quick.... and they're having to make very quick decisions on the fly."

Pardo told the BBC that it would be (7)to get e-sports into the Olympics. He said many people do not even see it as a real sport. He argues it is proper sport because it takes a lot of (8)effort and skill and is very exciting to watch. He believes it is a better and more popular sport than many of those already in the Olympics. Pardo said many people did not want gaming to become an Olympic sport because it is based on (9)and not athleticism. The PC Magazine website suggests there should be a separate (10)competition just for e-sports, that could follow a format like the Olympics. This would make gaming the star of the show rather than just another event among many in the Olympics.
