'Come on. I'll help you.' The voice came from the left and Jenny turned her head in that direction. She was blind, and had been from birth, but even without the sense of A21 _____, she could tell that the voice belonged to a middle-aged man. He touched her on the arm and she pulled back. The guide dog by her side looked up.

'Please,' she said, struggling to keep her anger A22 _____ control. 'That's very kind of you, but I don't need any help.'

'Oh,' the man said, and Jenny could imagine the look of confusion on his face. 'I'm sorry,' he said finally, and crossed the road. People just didn't seem to realise that there was a huge difference between offering help and trying to take control of somebody else's life. Sometimes she

A24 _____ the impression that she was independent, because today was the first day in her new job.

She waited until the signal from her dog told her that it was safe and she A25 _____ off across the road. When they reached the other side, she paused for a second to A26 _____ herself of the way and then continued. After a few days in the job, her dog would have learnt the way, but for now Jenny had to A27 _____ the distance to the right building. She counted her steps and listened. To anyone who could see, it would have seemed like a quiet street, but Jenny concentrated on the small sounds: her footsteps, a car going past, the bell on a bicycle. They helped her judge when she was coming close to the corner of the street, where she knew number 116 stood. They got there and she stopped. She patted her dog on the head.

'Well, boy, this is it,' she said. She knew there would be many challenges ahead. There always were. But at least she had overcome the first one: A28 _____ to the building. She stepped inside.
