

1. Americans were “obstinately incredulous” of the depths of barbarity suffered in France and therefore too lenient with those responsible.
2. The glory of Lyon’s defiance of 1941 and 1942 had been replaced—even as peace descended—by a pale despair at what had been lost.
3. Many prostitutes were subjected to brutal treatment for “horizontal collaboration,” whether they had actually been Nazi stooges or not.
4. When Dr. Jean Rousset opened the door at her old poste de commande, Virginia was not sure for a moment whether this skeletal yet dignified figure could really be her old lieutenant.
5. Virginia traveled on to the Haute-Loire to find out what had happened to her boys.
6. IN PARIS, VIRGINIA WAS GIVEN HER OSS APPRAISAL BEFORE RETURNING TO THE United States.

7. VIRGINIA HAD ONCE ADORED FRANCE AND ALWAYS WANTED TO LIVE OVERSEAS, SO why go home now?
8. Virginia had not turned out to be the society daughter that Barbara had wanted.
9. Virginia was a war hero, but finding work was anything but easy, especially for a disabled woman
