Interviewing a candidate for a position that (51) _____ just become vacant is no easy task, as any HR manager can tell. With the abundance of books such as "Job interviews for dummies", "Job interviews made easy", "Commonly Asked Job Interview Questions (with Key)" and a plethora of other how-to's, the interviewers (52) _____ easily predict what they will hear from some 80% of candidates who have taken pains to memorize the book wisdom, hoping to impress prospective employers with set phrases like "I have good communicative skills". A good interview question might then (53) _____ indeed a million dollar question, especially when recruiting (54) _____ top-level management positions.

Sadly enough, many interviewers have been in their HR-related jobs for so (55) _____ and have spoken to so many candidates that they seem to have lost the faculty of being creative and original, resorting to "safe" and typical topics like the candidate's (56) _____ experience, strengths and weaknesses, achievements and failures, why did you decide to leave your previous job and why do you want to work for this company. On the other (57) _____, there are those Catbert-like, malicious types who, just like the Inquisition, derive immense satisfaction from seeing a candidate nervously fidgeting on the chair, with panic (58) _____ their eyes, trying to comment in German on a random quotation from Einstein's Mein Weltbild that the evil interviewer had put in front of them and asked "What do you think about it?".

Instead of waiting for old and new management gurus to come up with a new set of "principles" and "guidelines" for interviewers, perhaps those (59) _____ for staff recruitment should simply start using their common sense. Is it really rocket science to forget about "What qualifications do you have?" (it's in the bloody CV, for heaven's sake) and ask "What would you do if...?" (60) _____ Mr Big Name in HR have to write a learned article in a prestigious Journal for Fundamental HR Issues before the truth about the uselessness of "Why did you leave your previous job?" can be revealed to the world?

No. It's just enough to ask the right questions.
