Many great people were said to be incredibly lazy including Einstein, Newton, Picasso, Mendeleev and others. Nevertheless, they managed to achieve unbelievable success and become well-known all over the world. That proves lazy people can actually go far. Here are some reasons lazy people are more likely to be successful.

Lazy people are very creative when it comes to organizing their work. They don't waste time on unnecessary things and get strict to the point. A lazy employee will always find a way to optimize a repetitive process.

Often lazy people are very enterprising. They have many ideas and projects as their minds are not filled with excessive thoughts and responsibilities. They think in different categories. It is important for them that the work process is not boring and there are guaranteed results at the end.

---

The most important thing is to know when to relax, as the more energy people expend, the less you have of it to fulfil big plans. People who strain themselves all the time age faster; their memory is falling much quicker.

---

Lazy people don't rush everything and don't jump from one thing to the other all the time. They take the time and get to task after task.

---

Lazy people know how to prioritize and to focus on their own goals, not on those imposed by other people. They are simply too lazy to pay attention to other people's priorities, so they focus on their own.

---

It actually takes a great mind to be lazy at work. You need to find ways to do nothing for a while and then to complete all the tasks on time. Employees tend to be either smart or stupid, lazy or painstaking. If you are smart and lazy, you probably are the most efficient worker in your company.

Lazy people know about all those things and use them to get the tasks done twice as fast. For example, if they work on a document, they wouldn't just write it and then send it to a lawyer, editor, manager and other people to check – that would take a lot of time. They would just create a Google Doc, give people access to the document so that they can review the document or make any correction at the same time.
