What do you do when you live on a very small island in the middle of the south Atlantic? People in Tristan da Cunha know the answer. Tristan da Cunha is a group of very small islands. The main island is between South Africa and Uruguay and it is very quiet. Eighty families live on the island – around 275 people – and there are only seven different surnames. New people can't live on Tristan da Cunha, so the number of Tristonians doesn't change. English is the first language, but people also use some Italian words.

There is one school for children aged four to sixteen. All the people on the island work, including children over the age of sixteen. Everyone works in agriculture. People also work on boats and go fishing, but only around ten days a year. The island has a small hospital – one doctor and five nurses work there – a supermarket and a post office. There is also a café and a fish factory for their food. These are all in the island's capital, Edinburgh of the Seven Seas.

People in Tristan da Cunha don't use mobile phones or have a cinema, but they have televisions. So, what do you think ... is island life too difficult?
