

Exercise 6

Read the information. Then choose the correct reason for using the passive in each sentence.

We often use the passive (e.g. something is / was done):

- to make our language sound more formal
- to show a link between the end of one sentence and the beginning of the next
- to describe impersonal or technical processes
- when the agent (the person or thing that did the action) isn't known
- when the agent isn't important to the story – for example, because we can easily work out who it is
- when we don't want to say who the agent is
- when we want to draw special attention to the agent. We use by before the agent and put it at the end of the sentence
- when the agent is a process or event, such as a storm or an accident. We often introduce this type of agent with in.

1. The office was broken into at around midnight.
 - The agent isn't known.
 - To show a link between the end of one sentence and the beginning of the next.
2. The thief was arrested in the early hours of this morning.
 - The agent is an event, not a person.
 - The agent isn't important (we can work out that the agent was the police).
3. I'm afraid some incorrect information was given at our last press conference.
 - The speaker is describing a process, so there's no need to mention people.
 - We don't want to say who the agent is.
4. The police are investigating the theft of a priceless painting. It was stolen from an art gallery last night.
 - To show a link between the end of one sentence and the beginning of the next.
 - The agent isn't important to the story (we can work out that the agent was the burglars).
5. Thank you for your help. It is greatly appreciated.
 - We don't want to say who the agent is.
 - To sound more formal.
6. The event was attended by over three thousand students.

- The agent is an event.
 - To draw special attention to the agent (i.e. the students).
7. The house was damaged in a storm.
- The agent was an event, not a person.
 - To sound more formal.
