Across America in the 1950s and 60s, children were at the frontlines of school desegregation battle. In his first for Look Magazine, my father was able to visualize aabout which he felt deeply: Civil

This schoolgirlin step with the federal marshals who protect her, past a tomato splattered against the wall in abloodlike splatch, past a scrawled racial slur, past the taunts of the unseen crowd that require her to be guarded. She marches on, perhaps every morning for weeks with a stoic.....

Themay have been a real girl in New Orleans, Ruby Bridges. Ruby was the first, and at that time, only African American child tothe formerly all-White William Frantz Elementary School. She had to beon her walk to school every day.parents kept their children home and Ruby was the only child in her class for theof the school year.
