I basically learned all the languages in my hometown Rome, Italy. I think is a falsehood that you have to go and _____ in a country in order to speak a language well. I think you can speak a language well no matter where you live because what really counts the most is how you live and with whom you talk in your everyday life. I _____ speak 13 languages and I'm learning my fourteen language and I have developed a certain way of maintaining these languages because obviously, I mean human beings are no super men so to make a long story short; the first thing is to develop certain habits so that you can actually be in _____ with the language on your own; you don't need other native speaker. One example is that I build this _____ that according to the room I find myself in and depending on the time of the day and the activity I engage in a certain language.

For example when I go and have lunch in the kitchen. I automatically remember I have to listen to a podcast in _____.

At nights, when I'm in bed, I read certain things in other languages and so on.

This is my micro environment that is where I live, the _____.

But I also speak a number of languages when I go out with my friends because it's also about life _____.

I mostly go out with foreigners; I love Italian, I love my country. But I tend to _____ a lot of time with foreigners because it's not only a great _____ to use languages in certain environments but it's also a way of seeing your own city through the lens of other people, which is an amazing experience because I think that reality is a multi-faceted _____ and you can see that reality through the eyes of other people and through the eyes or lenses of other languages.
