If you one day happen to be sailing across the Pacific, you may suddenly realise you're surrounded by hundreds of tonnes of rubbish. (1) _____. It contains plastic litter most of which came from ships, covering the surface of the water.

The litter covers a huge area of the ocean, although experts do not agree on its actual size. Some say it's around 700,000 square kilometres (twice as big as Poland). (2) _____. It's difficult to measure the real size because most of the litter is quite small and difficult to see even using satellite photos.

This rubbish is deadly to the marine life in the ocean. Fish and other sea creatures often get poisoned by the plastic elements they consume. Another problem is that some sea animals die because they are trapped in plastic nets and they cannot go to the surface to breathe. (3) _____

The rubbish area in the Pacific isn't the only one – it's just the largest. (4) _____. Smaller patches of litter can also be found near popular shipping routes like the one in the North Sea.

- A Others claim it might even be as large as Russia.
- B Both the Atlantic and the Indian Oceans have similar ones.
- C This area is known as the Great Pacific Garbage Patch.
- D This is the most effective way to clean up the area.
- E This often happens to sea turtles.

Ex. 4 Read the text and fill in the missing information.

I'd like to tell you about an incident I saw in a supermarket a few days ago. I was in the middle of my shopping when I noticed two teenagers who were taking some items from the shelves and hiding them under their jackets. They were trying to steal them! I couldn't believe my eyes! I mean, what were they thinking?! Didn't they realise they would most probably be caught and get a criminal record for that? Anyway, before I had a chance to do anything, a security guard turned up and stopped them. He probably saw what was going on the security screens. I couldn't help feeling sorry for the guys, but it was a really stupid thing to do. Why don't you share what you think about the whole thing?

- 3 Simon felt _____ when he realised what was going on.
