Teaching the next generation

— Another great way to teach very young children is to get them involved in a local environmental project. This includes cleaning up a local river, or picking up litter that people have thrown away. This can be very educational as the students are shown how their local environment is affected by different issues.

— The first thing we should consider is making sure that schools all go green. For example, we're encouraged to recycle paper at our school. This is important due to the fact that schools generally use a lot of paper. Young students would be able to see the difference their behavior makes in a practical way.

— So, I would encourage everyone to make sure that future generations understand more about the way nature is threatened by some of our actions. We need them to grow up caring for the environment

— If you're anything like me, you love nature. Perhaps you also worry about problems like climate change and the greenhouse effect. One important question is how we can teach students about those problems from an early age?
