Reading

A. Rebecca is reading an interesting article about impulsive shoppers.

Shop till you drop!

Pressures of everyday life have led people go on shopping malls to relax and shopping therapy has become a way of life for many people in the world. Countries like the USA have been witnessing the growth of consumers who virtually "shop till drop". Most of the shopaholics are women who spend a lot of their free time wandering around the malls buying anything from cosmetics to furniture. This has led to massive debt and large numbers of people living off credit cards. Overspending and debt lead in turn to extra pressures and depression so that shoppers go out and buy more to make themselves feel better. In this way the vicious circle continues and the purpose of shopping therapy has defeated itself.

But are consumers to blame? We live in a materialistic world and for many years big businesses have been spending money on advertising in order to persuade us to buy products we do not really need. Banks too, have been allowing people to borrow money they may never be able to pay back; these loans encourage them to keep spending.

Can we ever stop this cycle of needless spending and borrowing? According to some doctors, impulsive shoppers often have a low opinion of themselves and want to be surrounded by beautiful and expensive things to make themselves feel good. The only way to break this cycle is to help impulsive shoppers build up their self-confidence so they do not want to buy, buy, buy!
