21 Morris: a retrospective

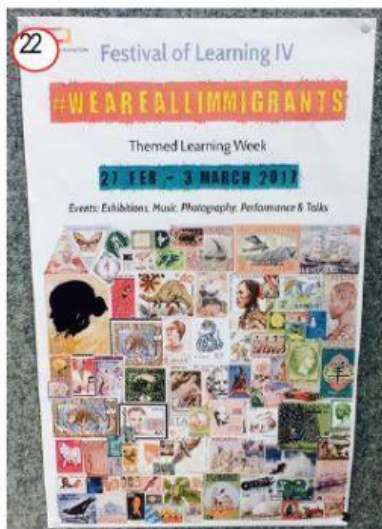

Black History Month saw the launch of a social history project to chronicle the life of Bristol activist Olive Morris.

One of London's Council's main buildings is named after her, but when artist Amy Laura Lopez de la Torre visited her for the first time in 1970, she was shocked to find out more and could find any information from the community.

She was soon put in touch with L2 One, one of Olive's friends, and a fellow activist during the 1970s. Twelve months on and the paper has just described the Black Liberation Movement, which will continue to look at her life and surroundings. They have been joined by supporters of Olive's family and other people who knew her.

"We hope to create some public memories and celebrate the woman's position in history. In the group there are women who have been active in the community for a long time and members of her family. What we are interested in is how we keep her history and memory for the future," said Amy.

The group came together through a shared interest in Olive's past and her role in the community. The next meeting of the BOD will take place on 5 November at the Council House, 100, St. Nicholas Road, Bristol from 6.30pm and is open to all women.
