A real-life "Spider-Man" has climbed some of the world's tallest buildings... with no ropes or safety equipment.

French climber, Alain Robert, well known for his amazing ability to climb enormous buildings, has succeeded in reaching the top of one of the highest structures in the world. He climbed the 452-metre Tower Two of the Petronas Twin Towers in Kuala Lumpur, the capital of Malaysia. Robert took two hours to complete his climb and, as usual, he used no ropes or safety equipment. If he had slipped, there was nothing between him and the road far below.

For 15 years, Robert has fascinated spectators and angered security guards by climbing skyscrapers and monuments such as the Eiffel Tower in Paris and the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco, California.

How does he do it?

He is an expert climber and makes his way slowly to the top by gripping window ledges and placing his fingers in cracks in the walls. He keeps a small bag of powder around his waist, to dry the sweat on his hands. Huge crowds gather to watch his terrifying climbs, but his activities have brought him a lot of trouble – he has been put into prison on four different continents. This is because he rarely gets permission for his climbs. He usually begins in darkness, appearing at dawn, already some distance up the side of his chosen building, and before anybody can stop him.

Success at last

This was Robert's third attempt to climb one of the Petronas Towers. On the two previous occasions, he had been stopped by security guards halfway through the climb. In this latest attempt, after finally reaching the top, he was immediately arrested. Robert was not too worried, however. "Climbing the Petronas has always been one of my dreams," he said.

Some problems on the way to the top

The "Spider-Man" may have completed many successful climbs, but his attempts have not always been without problems. When he was climbing the 100-storey Willis Tower in Chicago, a thick fog descended and covered the glass walls of the building with moisture, making it very wet and dangerous. He reached the top, but only after slow and careful progress. In London, he was caught in a storm and had to be rescued by window cleaners.

A recent fall...

More recently, Robert fell and needed emergency surgery for a painful cut after climbing... a small tree! He was being photographed for a magazine interview at the time.

1) Why is Robert's method of climbing so dangerous?

2) Why has Robert been in prison so often?

3) Why does Robert usually start his climbs in darkness?

4) Why was Robert unsuccessful in his earlier attempts to climb the Petronas Towers?

5) What is unusual about Robert's more recent fall?

Friend: _____?

Peter: We were only three, so the instructor could pay a lot of attention to each one of us.

Friend: And what about your ear?

Peter: No, it was fine. Anyway, Dr Johnston had given me some medicine in case I needed it. She said I _____ as I felt the slightest pain. But I didn't need it, luckily.

Friend: Tell me about the fish you saw. Anything special ... or dangerous?

Peter: Well, in one of the dives I was very close to a white shark.

Friend: A white shark! That's really dangerous! _____?

Peter: It was only a few metres away. It was quite scary.

Friend: I can imagine! _____ If it had attacked you?

Peter: I don't know! But the instructor had told us that if a shark came anywhere near us we were _____ and not to move at all.

Friend: Oh dear! I'm not sure I'd like to have that kind of experience.

Peter: Well, if _____ try a less dangerous location first. You probably need a little bit more experience before you go to a place like the Caribbean.

Friend: Sure. I'll take your advice.
