

Listen and fill in the gaps

I travel around the world and I usually stay with friends, not in hotels. I always take photos of my friends and last year I started taking photos of their [redacted], too. It's amazing what a [redacted] can tell you about a person. Look at this picture. You can see right away it's a single person – probably lives alone. There isn't much food in this [redacted] and maybe he doesn't like cooking. There's some [redacted] food here, Chinese [redacted]. There's not a lot of food, but he's got some [redacted], some [redacted] and an [redacted] up here. Oh and some [redacted]. I know he's a big [redacted] eater; let's see, has he got any [redacted]? OK, in this photo he hasn't got any [redacted], but I know he likes [redacted]. Look at all these [redacted] and [redacted] – I mean, he tries to be [redacted]. And I know him well. His name's Vinnie and he lives in New York City. He's single, a businessman, a quiet, serious guy. He buys [redacted] and [redacted], but he doesn't often cook; he often has [redacted] food or goes out to [redacted].

Look at this one. All this food – they've got some [redacted] here, some chicken – a roast chicken, ready to eat – and there's a big [redacted] and some really nice [redacted]. They've got all this [redacted] because they do a lot of exercise and they like having [redacted] with them when they go running or play tennis. You can see they try to be very [redacted] – just look at all that fresh food. But the main thing is, all this food is ready to cook. That tells me that these people are friendly; they like having friends for [redacted]. And it's true, Mike and Liz are really friendly and I love staying with them because they're funny and intelligent and there are always lots of people around in their apartment. I stay with them every time I go to Lisbon.
