Inferring

Omar walked sullenly back to his seat after turning it in to his teacher. His mother was going to be disappointed in him when she received the call later tonight. In his defense, it really had just fallen out of his backpack. He would never intentionally turn it on in class and break the school rules. The only reason he even brings it to school is because his mom insists on him letting her know when he arrives home each day, and it is just easier to take it with him. Also, he needs it in case he has car trouble or other difficulties on his way home. Now, she was going to hear from the school instead of him tonight. Omar hoped that she would be understanding and not too annoyed.
