the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are employed in the public sector has increased by 1.5 million, from 2.5 million in 1980 to 4 million in 1998. The public sector has also become an important employer of people with disabilities, with 1.5 million people with disabilities employed in the public sector in 1998, compared with 1.2 million in 1980.

There are a number of reasons why the public sector has become an important employer of people with disabilities. One reason is that the public sector has a long history of employing people with disabilities. In the 19th century, the public sector employed people with disabilities in a number of different roles, including as clerks, typists, and stenographers. In the 20th century, the public sector employed people with disabilities in a number of different roles, including as teachers, nurses, and social workers.

Another reason why the public sector has become an important employer of people with disabilities is that the public sector has a number of advantages over the private sector. One advantage is that the public sector is not subject to the same profit pressures as the private sector. This means that the public sector can afford to pay people with disabilities a fair wage, even if they are not as productive as people without disabilities. Another advantage is that the public sector has a number of policies in place to support people with disabilities in the workplace.

One of these policies is the requirement that employers in the public sector must provide reasonable adjustments to the workplace for people with disabilities. This means that employers must make changes to the workplace to ensure that people with disabilities can work safely and effectively. For example, employers might need to provide a person with a physical disability with a wheelchair, or a person with a hearing impairment with a hearing aid.

Another policy is the requirement that employers in the public sector must provide training and support for people with disabilities. This means that employers must provide people with disabilities with the same opportunities for training and development as people without disabilities. For example, employers might need to provide a person with a learning disability with additional support and supervision, or a person with a mental health problem with a flexible working arrangement.

There are a number of other reasons why the public sector has become an important employer of people with disabilities. One reason is that the public sector has a number of policies in place to promote equality of opportunity for people with disabilities. This means that the public sector is committed to ensuring that people with disabilities have the same opportunities as people without disabilities to work in the public sector.

Another reason is that the public sector has a number of policies in place to promote the employment of people with disabilities. This means that the public sector is committed to ensuring that people with disabilities are employed in the public sector in proportion to their numbers in the population. For example, the public sector might have a target to employ a certain percentage of people with disabilities in the next few years.

There are a number of other reasons why the public sector has become an important employer of people with disabilities. One reason is that the public sector has a number of policies in place to promote the employment of people with disabilities in a number of different roles. This means that the public sector is committed to ensuring that people with disabilities are employed in a variety of different roles, including in roles that are traditionally held by people without disabilities. For example, the public sector might have a target to employ a certain percentage of people with disabilities in senior management roles.
