Rouen, 30 May 1431. A great stone hall in the castle, arranged for a trial-at-law, there are two raised chairs side by side for the Bishop and the Inquisitor as judges. Looking down the great hall from the middle of the inner end, the judicial chairs and scribes' table are to the right. The prisoner's stool is to the left. There are arched doors right and left. It is a fine sunshiny May morning.

- The Inquisitor : Let the accused be brought in.
Ladvenu : [calling] The accused. Let her be brought in.
Joan, chained by the ankles, is brought in through the arched door behind the prisoner's stool by a guard of English soldiers. With them is the Executioner and his assistants. They lead her to the prisoner's stool, and place themselves behind it after taking off her chain. She wears a page's black suit.
- The Inquisitor : [kindly] Sit down, Joan. [She sits on the prisoner's stool].
You look very pale today. Are you not well?
- Joan : Thank you, I am well enough. But the Bishop sent me some carp; and it made me ill.
- Cauchon : I am sorry. I told them to see that it was fresh.
- Joan : You meant to be good to me, I know; but it is a fish that does not agree with me. The English thought you were trying to poison me – Cauchon and

The Chaplain : [together] What! No, my lord.

Joan : [continuing] They are determined that I shall be burnt as a witch; and they sent their doctor to cure me; but he was forbidden to bleed me because the silly people believe that a witch's witchery leaves her if she is bled; so he only called me filthy names. Why do you leave me in the hands of the English? I should be in the hands of the Church. And why must I be chained by the feet to a log of wood? Are you afraid I will fly away?

D'Estivet : [harshly] Woman, it is not for you to question the court; it is for us to question you.

Courcelles : When you were left unchained, did you not try to escape by jumping from a tower sixty feet high? If you cannot fly like a witch, how is it that you are still alive?

Joan : I suppose because the tower was not so high then. It has grown higher every day since you began asking me questions about it.
