And it seemed that a lot of people liked their idea. When they launched the first desktop version of Pinterest in March 2010, it grew quickly and had 10 million users after the first year. This was an amazing number compared with Twitter and Facebook: Twitter took two years to reach 10 million users and Facebook took over five years. Just a year after starting, Pinterest was worth $200 million and had over 421 million page views. According to Forbes, he is worth an estimated $1.6 billion as of 2018. Silbermann's ordinary interest as a boy certainly became an extraordinary business.

Ben Silbermann is an American billionaire Internet entrepreneur. He is the co-founder and CEO of Pinterest, a visual discovery engine, which lets users organize images, links, recipes and other things.

In 1998, Silbermann attended the Research Science Institute at MIT. Subsequently, he went to Yale University and studied political science. In 2006, when he graduated from university, he moved to the state of California and got a job at Google in the online advertising group where he learned to think big and met a lot of people there who were very interested in technology and built amazing products. Thanks to this experience, he decided two things: he wanted to start a business and he wanted to do something he loved.

Silbermann and Sharp realized they both loved collecting, and they made a 'virtual pinboard' - pages online where you 'pin' pictures of things you like and things you 'collect'. Their idea was to connect everyone in the world through the things they find interesting. Silbermann says that the genesis of Pinterest really came from his love of collecting as a kid. "Collecting tells a lot about who you are," he said, and when they looked at the web "there wasn't a place to share that side of who you were."

E

Silbermann was an ordinary boy. He was born in 1982. He was raised in Des Moines, Iowa. His parents are ophthalmologists, and he is married to Divya Bhaskaran, with whom he has two children. He loved collecting things: stamps, leaves and especially insects. At the time, he felt like any other child, but as a young man in his 20s, his love of collecting became big business.

F

He worked at Google for two years. Then, in 2008, Silbermann left his job and he started his own business designing his own iPhone apps with his friend, Paul Sciarra. However, their initial application, Tote, failed to gain significant attraction. After that, they teamed up with Evan Sharp, and they got an apartment together in Palo Alto, California, and started work on Pinterest in November 2009.
