Developing countries have seen enormous changes in society, and one of the biggest changes is undoubtedly the ever increasing involvement of women in education and employment. More and more women in these countries are attending university, getting higher education degrees, and going out to work. They no longer want to stay at home and do the household chores, in the sole role of a housewife. This significant change will greatly affect the socio-economic growth of these countries.

When more women go out to work, the financial burden of the male 'breadwinners' in the family will be reduced. Moreover, women and their husbands join hands to share the housework duties when they come back home. This change will certainly help their family life become happy. Children will get more affection and care from their fathers. They will also learn to be more independent since both parents will work.

6. Developing countries have witnessed the increasing involvement of men in education and work.
7. Women nowadays only like staying at home and doing the housework.
