

UNIT 2 REVIEW QUIZ

From old to new

Not everyone was enthusiastic about the new technology. While a lot of people thought it was useful and would improve people's lives, its critics were not so sure. "It will make things too easy," the critics said. "People will forget things because they won't need to use their memories." What were they talking about? The calculator? The computer? No, they were talking about writing.

Writing first appeared 8,000 years ago and storytellers soon realized that it was a danger to their profession. At that time, people went to public squares to listen to traveling storytellers tell their entertaining tales. A lot of the stories were incredibly long. To help them remember the spectacular plots and all the characters, the storytellers used special memory techniques while they were speaking. Writing, the storytellers believed, would end the need for their profession and their amazing memories.

It seems that people's ideas about new things don't change. Every time a new invention appears, there is always someone who says it will be dangerous.
