Marilyn told herself that Ria's instructions about what to do on arriving in Dublin had been excellent. Ria advised that she should get a bus to the city, leave her bags, and walk up to have breakfast in a Grafton Street coffee shop. This way she could pass O'Connell Bridge on the River Liffey, the entrance to Trinity College, and she would see the various bookshops and gift stores which she might like to explore later. After breakfast she should go up and walk around St Stephen's Green. A few statues and places of interest were listed in the program, ending up at a place where she should take a taxi, pick up her luggage, and head for Tara Road. One of the people already mentioned would be there to welcome her and show her around.

It had all gone very well. Marilyn had not properly remembered the whole city from her visit before. It had certainly changed and become much more attractive. The traffic was much denser, the cars bigger, the people better dressed. Around her were foreign accents, different languages. It was not only the American tourists who came to the craft shops nowadays; the places seemed full of other Europeans.

At around eleven thirty her feet were beginning to feel tired. It was time to find her new home. The taxi-driver told her a long complicated tale of unhappiness about there being too many taxis allowed on the streets of the city and not enough work for them all. He said that most people were off exploring the world, that he was sorry that he hadn't gone to America like his brother, who now had a German wife. As he drove into Tara Road, he said that it was the fastest-growing place in Dublin.

When Marilyn came to Tara Road, the door was opened by a dark, good-looking man in his early forties. He came down the steps. "On Ria's behalf you're welcome to Tara Road," he said. "I'm Colm Barry, neighbor and friend."

Ria's photographs had not lied. The house was wonderful. On the table was a huge bowl of roses. "Ria asked me to leave those for you," he said. Colm carried Marilyn's bag upstairs and showed her the main bedroom. "I expect this is where you'll be, I'm sure all the details were written out for you. It took Ria several weeks to prepare for your visit."
