Once in class, we went straight to our seats, boys and girls sitting side by side. As soon as we sat down, we forgot our quarrels. We became all ears, and sat absolutely still.

Our teacher gave his lessons in an impressive silence. I should just like to have seen what would have happened if we so much as stirred in our seats. Our teacher moved like lightning. He was here, there and everywhere.

We were remarkably attentive, despite his monotonous voice. Even though we were young, we all regarded our school work as something deadly serious. Everything we learned was strange and unexpected. It was as if we were learning about life on another planet.

He never gave us an opportunity to interrupt his lessons. And so we tried to attract the teacher's attention as little as possible; for we lived in constant dread of being sent to the chalkboard.
