3. There are healthier ways to develop a child

Helicopter parenting isn't the only way. Have you heard of free-range parenting?

Instead of monitoring every activity of your child like Helicopter Parents do, Free-Range parents give children enough autonomy wherever possible to ensure they grow up to be self-reliant. The idea of "free range" comes from livestock that are kept under natural conditions. Children under free-range parenting have the independence and autonomy to dictate many aspects of their lives without having their parents constantly monitoring them. Free range parents help build their children's confidence and self-sufficiency by encouraging them to learn as they go and not butting in all the time. Parents do not dictate their schedule and allow the children to have unstructured play time instead of engaging them in structured activities. Time spent outdoors on their own is also emphasised over screen time or indoor supervised play. Free range parents make critical decisions such as education and house rules, but the line is drawn at decisions that children can make on their own.
