Sleeping on the JOB

In the 1990s, what would happen if you fell asleep at work? Perhaps, your employer would sympathize with you, assume you were ill, and send you home. But if your napping became a daily 1), you would probably soon lose your job! After all, sleeping on the job shows a clear lack of professionalism. Or does it? In Japanese culture the exact opposite is true. There, it is very common to see 2) members snoozing at their desks. Inemuri, which means 'sleeping while present', is an entirely acceptable practice which is even considered quite honourable. It's seen as a sign that you're working 3) hard that you can't continue without closing your eyes for a short period. In fact, it has been suggested that many Japanese office workers fake napping at work to impress their boss! There are some unwritten rules to inemuri, though. For example, you may only sleep in an upright seated position, so that you can always be ready to answer your phone or 4) to an urgent question. Today, many sleep experts think that inemuri makes a lot of business sense, too. According to research, 5) a ten-minute 'power nap' can energize you far more than a cup of coffee.
