Culinary tourism

Culinary tourism can be defined as the exploration of food and drinks while traveling. Culinary tourism creates experiences that connect tourist not only with the food, but also with the history, traditions, and culture of a country.

Nowadays, travelers don't just look for traditional sights, but they want to have real experiences and contact with local people. Culinary tourism offers travelers this great opportunity.

Culinary tourism is not only related to expensive restaurants, but to all of the activities that relate to food. For example, you can:

- Take a street food tour;

- Follow product routes of a particular region (e.g. travel on the Brazilian coffee route);
- Eat at traditional restaurants;
- Share meals with local people;
- Participate in gastronomic events and festivals;
- Visit local markets;
- Learn about the production of food by visiting farms and artisan producers;
- Participate in cooking classes;
- Visit exhibitions that explain the history of local cuisine;
