Later that night when a whole group of sharks arrive. They eat what's left of the catch.
The first shark takes a hefty bite before the old man stabs him with the harpoon.
Other fisherman measured the skeleton and found it was eighteen feet long.
On this day, the old man decides to venture out farther than he normally would.
When the fish is close enough, the old man stabs him with his harpoon to kill him. Then he uses most of his rope to tie the fish to the side of the boat.
When the story begins, the boy is probably around twelve years old, and the old man Santiago has gone eighty-four days without catching a fish.
Even though the old man successfully caught up and could prove what he'd done, he got nothing for it.
The next two sharks take off about a quarter of the catch before they die, taking the old man's harpoon with them.
The man reaches the shore and must drag his mast and sail home despite his lacerated hands and exhaustion.
From the way the fish pulls the entire boat, the old man knows he has a very large catch.
