

TWO MILLION FOLLOWERS?

Fill in the blanks with the correct form of the root word on the right.

Some users of Twitter have thousands of followers. Clearly, they are (1) _____ people. But some of their followers are pretty silent and (2) _____; in fact, they don't seem remotely interested in the (3) _____ of the person they are following. And there's a reason for this: they are (4) _____, added to the person's account by companies that sell fake social media followers to anyone hoping to boost their reputation. The number of followers a user has is often seen as an indicator of their social influence or (5) _____. Therefore, people such as artists or aspiring musicians might not find the idea (6) _____. Having thousands of followers could enhance their image as a (7) _____ commodity and even lead to offers of work. Although it's not (8) _____ to sell followers and it can be lucrative, somehow it feels (9) _____ and unsatisfying. If your followers are fake, they don't care about you - and certainly don't read your comments. So what's the point of tweeting at all?
