Battlefront is a TV programme which helps young people between 14 and 21 years old to turn their ideas for campaigns into reality by using TV, social networking sites and online videos. New technology is making it easier than ever for young people to take up campaigning. One campaigner working with Battlefront is Aimee Nathan, 17, from London. She is trying to stop people using disposable coffee cups. These are non-recyclable because of their plastic covering. Highlights of her campaign included appearing on TV and getting a crowd of people, including a famous model, to take their own mugs to a coffee shop. Aimee's Facebook page played a big part in publishing the event.

Another Battlefront campaigner, Peter White, 19, from Birmingham, became aware of the importance of road safety when several people he knew were killed or injured in road accidents. He was shocked to discover that traffic accidents are the biggest cause of death for 15-19-year-olds worldwide. He decided to focus his campaign on the danger of crossing the street while listening to music on an MP3 player. He has used Twitter in his campaign and made a video for the Battlefront website. He is now hoping to work with musicians to make his campaign go viral!
