Are Americans eating better?

Most health experts agree: Americans are eating too much, and the population as a whole is getting heavier. But if you look at recent changes in Americans' eating habits, not all of them have been bad. There have been some improvements, although some poor habits remain. Consider these facts.

- Americans are still eating too much meat, but they're eating less beef and more chicken and fish. That's good because chicken and fish have less fat than red meat.
- They're drinking less milk, but they're also eating more cheese than before. So they're still getting too much fat from milk products.

- Americans are eating fewer eggs. Many people think fewer eggs means less heart disease.
- They're eating more carbohydrates such as rice, potatoes, bread, and beans. Some think this is a good change, but others say it's adding to Americans' weight problems.
- Americans are eating about five servings of fruits and vegetables a day. That's not bad, but eight to ten servings would be better.
- Americans are eating too much fat and sugar because they eat too many prepared (fast) foods, which contain these ingredients.
