Ukrainian teenagers, like their counterparts in the UK and the USA, are big fans of mobile phones. They're often called _____ because they spend a lot of time online, staring at screens. With their smartphones and tablets, they can connect with their friends whenever and wherever they want. Interestingly, just like British teens, Ukrainian teens don't really use their phones to make calls to their _____. Instead, they enjoy watching video clips, playing games, sharing _____and stories, and sending quick instant messages. Social media is a big part of their lives, and they prefer using the latest apps and videos to stay connected, leaving the older websites and _____to their parents.

But there's a difference when it comes to school. In Ukraine, there are no strict laws about using phones in school, but teachers can decide to ___them if they think it's necessary. However, not all teachers agree on this, and some even encourage students to ____their smartphones for educational purposes.

A recent report in Ukraine suggests that banning smartphones from schools might help students focus better on their education. It argues that smartphones can be distracting and make students less productive in their learning.

On the other hand, in the United States, some schools have started allowing students to use smartphones in the _____. They believe that smartphones can be valuable tools for learning, as they carry a lot of information in their pockets, making learning easier and more ___. So, in these schools, smartphones can definitely help you become smarter!
