Conversation: In style

In Style: Amanda, how did you become interested in fashion?

Amanda: I've been making clothes since I was a kid. I used to dress up my dolls for special events like Halloween or the Academy Awards. But it was just for fun. I never thought of becoming a fashion designer.

In Style: I believe you wanted to start an agro business. When did you make the transition?

Amanda: I was doing a business course at college, but I also took up design. I very quickly realized that my heart and talent were in fashion and I switched majors.

In Style: And now you've created your own label, and you've achieved world fame at a very young age. I take it that your new collection is based on traditional Indonesian designs. Do you think fashion has become globalized?

Amanda: In some aspects, yes. The fabrics and materials are obtained from different countries, and designers are always on the lookout for interesting ethnic patterns that they can adapt. But on the other hand, countries still like to keep their traditional clothing styles.
